To evaluate the utility of screening mammography in a population-based breast cancer detection program. In an area with 75% participation in the program, women aged 40 to 79 years attending 10 mammography centers were randomly assigned to screening mammography and, if desired, a diagnostic ultrasound examination. Screening examination was performed with full-field mammography; diagnostic examination, with high-resolution real-time ultrasound. Women with negative screening mammography results returned to the center for a repeat examination, 1 year later. The outcome data were originally collected by record linkage with a provincial cancer registry. Primary analysis was restricted to 2909 women with breast cancer treated in community hospitals and no change in therapy between diagnosis and death. In this population, the sensitivity of screening mammography was 98.8% (95% confidence interval [CI]: 98.0 to 99.7) and the specificity was 57.8% (95% CI: 57.0 to 58.7). The positive predictive value was 17.7% (95% CI: 16.8 to 18.6) and the negative predictive value was 99.4% (95% CI: 99.0 to 99.8). No difference was noted between regions, with the exception of the northwest. Because the cost of screening mammography is less than $600 per woman, our data indicate that, in a population-based screening program, the cost-effectiveness is favorable in the first 2 years of the program. Although the specificity of screening mammography is lower than that of diagnostic mammography, such low specificity may be offset by changes in the use of diagnostic examinations.Q: How to create association between tables in Entity Framework?
